Take the new SAF Casework course

Available now for all employees and volunteers.

When our country is in crisis, the highly trained men and women of the U.S. Armed Forces respond at a moment's notice. They deploy leaving behind families to manage the stressors associated with everyday life.

When a military family is in crisis, it's the highly trained men and women of the American Red Cross who are there to respond to their needs.

The Red Cross is seeking volunteers interested in serving as caseworkers for Service to the Armed Forces (SAF). The SAF caseworker is a compassionate problem-solver who employs quality communications skills with close attention to detail to relieve the stress of military families during their times of crisis. The first step to this rewarding job is to participate in the new SAF Casework course.

What you can do after taking Introduction to SAF Casework:

- Apply critical thinking skills to helping members of the U.S. military and their families in crisis situations
- Use good communication and interview techniques to help military families prevent, prepare for and respond to emergencies
- Link military members and their families to resources in your community and to the American Red Cross' worldwide communications system
